...Anna died at home after a long illness. Her daughter Jean gets the news at 3am and calls KORU where she provides some basic information including her mother's current location. KORU arranges for her mother's body to be brought to the mortuary that evening. The next day our staff receive the Medical Certificate signed by Anna's physician and begin the Registration of Death.

We have a meeting over the phone with Jean where she makes decisions about her mother's final resting and ceremony. The following day KORU arranges to have Anna bathed and dressed in a clean gown. With the death registration in place it is possible to arrange for the next steps...

...Jean and her siblings have been very involved in their mother's care up to her death. They decide that they want to have an active role in some of her after-death care as well. As a group they decide to have Anna's body brought to KORU for a family-assisted dressing.

The siblings each fall into their routine while tending their mother's familiar hands and feet into her final outfit. There are tears and laughter and tender moments.

When she is ready the siblings lift and place her in the pine casket together. They spend an hour lovingly placing flowers, notes, and drawings from the grandchildren beside her. Finally they place the lid and each sibling writes a farewell note on the casket itself.

With this final piece in place the family is ready to depart and have KORU look after the remainder of their mother's care.

...Jean and her siblings felt that they had really prepared for their mother's death. They appreciate that service options are available but do not feel that hands-on deathcare is a fit for their family.

They request that KORU look after the services for their mother in a way that honours her memory and the planet. With this in mind they select a simple pine-based cremation container and choose minimal additions to a simple cremation.

KORU arranges to have one Death Certificate sent by registered mail to Jean right away so she is able to begin settling the estate. When Anna's cremation is completed the following week it is arranged for KORU to bring her urn to Jean's home.

The siblings feel that this no fuss approach to end-of-life care would suit their mother perfectly.

...Anna considered herself an environmentally-conscious person in life and had talked with her family about a green burial. As such, Jean had researched and chosen a green burial cemetery for Anna's final resting in the months before her death.

KORU contacts the cemetery and schedules Anna's burial for the following week. Jean and her siblings know that the Natural Burial Shroud was exactly what their mother had in mind. They pick some flowers from her garden to place atop her shrouded body.

The day of the burial arrives, KORU's staff places Anna's shrouded body in the service van (no hearses!). The siblings are at the cemetery when she arrives. The door of the vehicle is opened, flowers are placed, and it is time to begin the burial service.

...Anna loved her church and never missed a Sunday service. Jean knows that it is the only place to have her mother's funeral. Anna cared strongly for traditions and wished to have the support of both KORU and the church to carry through her final rites.

The siblings feel comforted by the familiar pews and the ritual of the service. KORU has arranged all of the details of the event so the family is able to arrive and participate without concern for logistics. Following the service her casket is placed and transported in procession to the graveside where Anna is laid to rest alongside her family.

...At the time of Anna's death Jean calls KORU for guidance on the next steps for her care. After much discussion the siblings have decided to keep their mother's body at home for an additional two days. They want to spend this time sitting with her, listening to music, eating familiar foods, and inviting their friends and family to join them.

The siblings decide to have a KORU funeral director come to the home in the morning to assist with preparing the room for Anna's extended stay. The funeral director stays for two hours and provides supplies and instructions for the coming days. During this time KORU gathers the essential details to complete registration of death and to arrange for final resting.

Two days later, Anna's family is ready for her body to be received by KORU. The time is arranged and the staff arrive with her pine casket. The siblings assist with placing Anna's body in the van along with some of her flowers and love notes from her community.

Whether for cremation or burial, the home funeral has provided family utmost control during this transition. Please see note on reverse.

Home funerals require significant participation from the family to complete care independently.

There is no morgue facility included as the family will be keeping the body at home until time of cremation or burial. Please ensure that KORU is notified in order to request the cremation or burial take place after an appropriate length of time.

Should the family decide to transfer before the scheduled cremation date the sheltering facilities fee ($200.00) and transportation fee ($450) will be added.
